A MODERN CAESAR

In the wild tempest of political struggle it is sometimes difficult to trace the truth or number the slain, but easily the greatest figure in the present battle is W. J. Bryan. Whether he becomes president of this great Republic or goes down again in defeat, he will still remain the most eminent statesman of this generation. From out of the chaos and clash of contending forces there rises in the very center of the storm the Caesar of modern history, who with the calm demeanor of a prophet, and the quiet persuasive voice of a mentor, says: Peace, be still. The work of Bryan can no more perish from the earth than that of Julius Caesar, who although assassinated yet molded and really created the elements that have become modern Europe and in fact modern civilization. This Republic could not be what it is without Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln, and it couldn't be the splendid government we shall know in the future without Bryan. Few of the great constructive statesmen of our country have reached the chair of the chief executive. Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Benton and Blaine have been thrust aside to make way for smaller men, but their work abides. The Rough Rider in the White House seems like a pigmy and a dwarf in point of real greatness. Roosevelt rides the country like it was an unbroken broncho, and guides it toward his selfish goal with relentless hand, breathless and strenuous amid the threatened wreck of his country. Bryan, on the other hand turns into the track of civilization all the institutions that make for peace and national prosperity and greatness. His is no new political philosophy, but the reincarnation and rehabilitation of the sermon on the Mount, the Golden Rule and the twentieth century decalogue.

When President Roosevelt and his class are all run dry and nothing more to say, W. J. Bryan will be just beginning to unlimber. His fifteen or twenty years spent in the study of world wide politics has not been in vain. The American people are beginning to realize that he knows a good deal about politics and constructive statesmanship.

The knockers will have to get in their work pretty soon and very effectively if twenty miles of sidewalk is not finished before the advent of the new year.

Nick Longworth is indiscreet enough to tell tales outside the family when he gives away the plan of having Taft for President eight years and then Roosevelt again.

If the democrats of Oklahoma are wise they will carry this election by as big a majority as possible before reading anybody out of the party. There are a few scores to settle later on however.

Roosevelt and Haskell are the same pattern of man in at least one important particular. Each feels that every man he has favored at any time and in any way, however small, should rise in his place and offer a word of palliation and defense.

In a presidential year the weakest possible way to vote is to scratch the ticket, and the strongest and sanest vote on such an occasion is a straight party vote. This of course applies to democrats, a republican with half sense will at least vote part right.

The republican party is mighty badly split up but the record of that political organization is that they get together when election days come. But the prayers of Senator Foraker for the success of Taft will not ascend higher than the seat of his chair.

There has been nothing to change the sentiment of the people from the vote cast last year. The majority rolled up by the democrats a year ago is more than likely to be repeated at the general election next month. There is no good reason why the democratic ticket should not win by at least 50,000.

Is it possible for Vinita to secure gas in practically unlimited quantities, and if so what sum could she afford to pay? This is a question that is now up for an immediate answer. Do we want factories? Do we want to become a manufacturing city? If so, then we may properly consider the gas proposition.
